When last we left our intrepid, undead hero, he was dealing with his newfound fame, an angel, and a cat girl. But before all that happened...

First, there was Hell on earth. Which, let's face it, was pretty exciting in a run-screaming-for-your-life-from-unspeakable-demony-thingies and is-that-really-a-dragon? sort of way. After sending L.A. directly into The Apocalypse, Wolfram & Hart also left Angel a little parting gift: His humanity. So he had to fight all the minions and creatures and demi-gods of the underworld as a broken human held together mostly by magic, glamour, and will. But it all worked out—kind of. Sure, Gunn became a vampire. And Illyria went insane and turned native. And Connor got killed. And then Angel lost his head. Literally. But still. It all got dialed back to “now,” whenever that is.

Angel and Connor were reunited, manly tears were shed, and L.A. went back to “normal.” Only, everyone remembered. They remembered Hell. They remembered Angel and his curse.

At first, it was okay. A lot of people just decided to pretend it hadn't really happened. Hollywood made an awful movie that only barely resembled the real events. Although, to be fair, Spike was a pretty hot lady. And then there was that whole Comicon switcheroo that involved evil bears and one too many Angels. So, you know, nothing that out of the ordinary.

But now Angel Investigations is back up and running and everything should be hitting a groove once again. A little demon slaying here. A little prophecy ruminating there. And there's always time for a good solid brood.

Unfortunately, that's precisely when Angel goes missing...
